

2RV

24.1 (Fall 2019)

The 2River View

24.1 (Fall 2019)

new poems by

Debora Chappell, Sarah Anderson, Sheila Black Charlotte Covey, Jesse DeLong, Darren C. Demaree Sean Lause, Michael Meyerhofer, Yiskah Rosenfeld Esther Sadoff, Laura Lee Washburn

2River

www.2River.org

7474 Drexel DR • University City • MO • 63130 • USA

The 2River View, 24.1 (Fall 2019)

The 2River View

24.1 (Fall 2019)

About 2River

Since 1996, 2River has been a site of poetry and art, quarterly publishing The 2River View and occasionally publishing individual authors in the 2River Chapbook Series. 2River is also the home of Muddy Bank, the 2River blog.

Richard Long
2River

ISSN 1536-2086
www.2River.org
www.muddybank.org www.facebook.com/2RiverPoetry www.instagram.com/2riverpoetry/2river.tumblr.com @2weetRiver

The 2River View, 24.1 (Fall 2019)

Contents

Debra Chappell
It Is Autumn

Sarah Anderson
In a Different Life
Twenty-Three Years a Widow

Sheila Black
Aubade of Many
Garden

The Man who Disappears © 2019 by Sirenes

Jesse DeLong has appeared in Colorado Review, Indiana Review, Mid-American Review, and Typo, as well as in the anthologies Best New Poets 2011 and Feast: Poetry and Recipes for a Full Seating at Dinner.

Darren C. Demaree is the author of eleven poetry collections, most recently Emily As Sometimes the Forest Wants the Fire (Harpoon Books, 2019).

Sean Lause is a professor of English at Rhodes State College in Lima, Ohio. His poems have appeared in Another Chicago Magazine, The Beloit Poetry Journal, and The Minnesota Review. His latest book of poems is Midwest Theodicy (Taj Mahal Review, 2019).

Michael Meyerhofer is the poetry editor of Atticus Review. His fifth book of poetry, Ragged Eden, was published by Glass Lyre Press.

Yiskah Rosenfeld holds an MFA from Mills College. She balances solo parenting and teaching in the San Francisco Bay Area. A Pushcart Prize nominee, she received the Anna Davidson Rosenberg Award and the 2019 Jeff Marks Memorial Honorable Mention Prize through december magazine.

Esther Sadoff has a bachelor's degree from Sarah Lawrence College and a Master of Education from The Ohio State University. This publication at The 2River View is her first.

Laura Lee Washburn, author of This Good Warm Place (March Street) and Watching the Contortionists (Palanquin Chapbook Prize), has published poems in such journals as 9th Letter, Carolina Quarterly, Harbor Review, Poet Lore, The Sun, and Valparaiso Review.

The 2River View, 24.1 (Fall 2019)

Contributors

Debora Chappell has a BA in English and an MA in Creative Writing-Poetry. Her work has appeared in The Denver Quarterly.

Sarah Anderson holds an MFA in poetry from the Warren Wilson Program for Writers. Her poems have appeared in various journals, including The Café Review, December magazine, North American Review, and Raleigh Review.

Sheila Black is the author of four poetry collections, most recently Iron, Ardent (Educe Press, 2017). Her poems have appeared in The New York Times, Poetry, The Spectacle, and elsewhere.

Charlotte Covey lives in St. Louis, where she earned her MFA in Poetry from the University of Missouri. She has poetry published or forthcoming in journals such as The CALYX Journal, The Normal School, and Salamander Review.

Charlotte Covey
last night in chincoteague
phone sex lullabies

Jesse DeLong
As if the tunnel is a river
Sitting on a Hill Overlooking Tuscaloosa

Darren C. Demaree
Emily as a Charcoal Halo
Emily as Most of the Thunder is Just Theatre

Sean Lause
The man who turned inside-out
The old man in the cage

Michael Meyerhofer
Passing Along the News
Two Baths

Yiskah Rosenfeld
Love Poem on the Morning after Atonement
Seventh Day in the Valley

Esther Sadoff
Behind the White Hose Box
Dance of the Sun

Laura Lee Washburn
Between the Wars
History

Mystery © 2019 by Sirenes

History

The history of all times, and of today especially, teaches that . . . women will be forgotten if they forget to think about themselves.

Louise Otto-Peters

So who cares if you don't have another ride to the grocery store or if he's still keeping your dog that you really love but can't have in this apartment and who loves his yard or if he's been such a good friend for so long and besides doesn't want anything from you and you're probably the only really good influence in his life?

If you're hanging out with the same guy who put his hands around your neck and a pillow over your nose and mouth and even if it was only that one time, who exactly is thinking about you—besides me and I'm rolling my cart quick down a different aisle unable to say anything nice, and certainly not willing to smile.

Laura Lee Washburn

Between the Wars

we are expected to imagine these movie boys living on in wrecked Germany.
I came in late on this and find the whole thing strange.
Her lungs wreck her when she pulls up on the dock. The sanitarium's in snow.
All the money is gone.
Men are splitting heads in the streets, wrecking cars, shooting to kill.

If he kills him in a cathedral how can no one know? If she walks to watch him goodbye, she'll die from her bone.

Two ghosts walk with two men out of the next war and into the heat. Let's get drunk, let's smoke. We're America just up from the trenches, skidooing into schools and ranging cars dragging ourselves slowly in, burning our way out.

Debora Chappell

It is Autumn

Dad, it is autumn here. The acequias are lined with flame yellow cottonwoods and the robin's egg blue sky hangs over the mountain. I breathe like you taught me.
It calls to me every autumn, so I hike the mountain trail as far as I can, then sit and breathe as you taught me. Birds ready themselves for winter as does the blue-tailed lizard sunning next to me.
Unafraid, he watches me just before a deer tiptoes in and freezes. I move slowly back down the alluvial plain and breathe like you taught me. I follow the alluvial plain to the river and revel in the smell of roasting chile. It is autumn here.
Winter will come soon enough and I breathe as you taught me.

Sarah Anderson

In a Different Life

I draw in a quick breath. He places his glasses on the podium, looks up and reads. I think of the way headache distorts as leaded glass.

I think of the headache I have caused. Stop. It's been twenty years—or He loved her, the girl in Germany. I knew, but spent the night with him still on a hard wood floor by a lit fireplace.

Now, still, evening air rustles an oak. Are those trees ice-resistant really?

Think of two people in a tent who have been up all night, a thunderstorm wild through them. I will always listen to you. You ache for this.

There's a cold and barely discovered quarry. Meet me.

Esther Sadoff

Dance of the Sun

I'd like to bundle up all my things and place them on the shining head of a pin or have them fit on the brimful ledges of my eyes—tears dried like tissue paper, little moth wings that stuck and dried, seafoam outlining the damp memory of the mournful waves.

Let the lozenge of memory dissolve and keep nothing very particular except the custard yellow of the sky, the swirling wind shaking the trees, the tousled piles of gray clouds, and a house the color of tawny ash all at once illuminated in white light as if the sun suddenly lifted up her ruffled dress, kicked off her shoes and began to dance.

Esther Sadoff

Behind the White Hose Box

A spider hides behind the white hose box, black and dry as paper.
The spider dashes like a scattering of leaves as I tap my foot to announce my coming for the hose.

The hose unfurls itself, waxy and mottled and stretches like a cat with a belly of green diamonds in the crackling and matted lawn.

I turn the stiff faucet that squeaks and reels, drumming up its downpour from some deep cavern and spritzing water from its loose and shining neck.

I tap my feet each day as the spider purses its bristling legs together into a tense and watchful ball.
Even in the winter, I tap my feet and check for the spider hiding there, a spider long turned to hollow ash.

Sarah Anderson

Twenty-Three Years a Widow

His poems took her breath away, waiting in an envelope for her on the other side of the world, and it's as if I remember my grandmother sweeping the stage while he played the piano, moments before they met. To my mother, who is moving back into her childhood home, I say, keep, at least in a box, the chandelier pieces she coveted. She never imagined she could live without him. Keep the Cartier pocket watch she designed for him there on the mantle. What did she wear to the premiere of that symphony he wrote for her?

She called the dog down the back hill every night as if calling to people on the shoreline.

Sheila Black

Aubade of Many

In Yeshir Ev, I woke to shadow, lace. fake flowers on the ceiling. winter's slate smoke, apple tea, which tasted of sorrow, to bare feet on concrete, the understanding I would be leaving for much of my life.
In Yeshir Ev I woke to troubles more dense than any I had known, the rule of distance governing us all. Lose, and you simply smoke more cigarettes, grind your teeth at night, etc. I can hardly bear to remember how happy I was.
Morning, a clinking of tinny bells, a bomb exploding two streets away.
What did I think I would ever keep? In the lobby, the major domo in dusty red and gold braid strolled through the dining room, turning the crumbed tablecloths with a flick of his wrist.

Yiskah Rosenfeld

Seventh Day in the Valley

Blue jays exchanged mating calls hopping and swooping around me on the deck raucous rattle and sweet kuet kuet kuet, then flying branch to branch to start their nest.
Yellow roses made their final bows scattered patterned petals in a path to the kitchen.
There I made a careful pot of tea.
The mountain was jagged in places, soft in others, and magnificent.
As the sky darkened, the house was as quiet as I'd ever known it.
Even the dictionary pressed its words against flat red leaves in little kisses.
A coyote crossed the driveway, then turned to watch. We watched each other. We watched a good, long while.
How I knew I had, at last, grown still.

Yiskah Rosenfeld

Love Poem on the Morning after Atonement

If not you, then at least the ladders of light angling through your morning windows voices still sleepwalking on the windowsills at least the tall tilt of mirror where liquid angels run up and down the one place that you and I are both at least myself as you could never see me pregnant angel of your dreams filtering through the rooms like the coffee and the light

If not you, then that angel's wing rising to its elbow-perfect fold and falling

Sheila Black

Garden

It took me too long to get quiet, to see anything but blur in the trees, the rabbit that hopped out under the bird feeder, the twitching of the fledgling robin so curious it almost came right up to him.
I was thinking of that game we played when we were kids—silly string wrapped around us until we were caught in a giant web; if anyone moved the web trembled, and of the terror of being linked by gigabytes as opposed to rain or myth; I hadn't sat by myself in a garden for a long time.
I was bored at first, used to sights being presented to me like dishes in a fancy restaurant. The bench was wet, and the soil beneath had a heady mushroom smell. Rain dripped from the trees and onto my shirt It took me a long time to breathe. Swallows scissored as the sky muted. The puddles silvered, and the rabbit twitched and vanished into the hedge. I didn't see where the robin went. The worms spangled the lawn, some dying right there on the wet pavement.

Charlotte Covey

last night in chincoteague

each wave feels like a lullaby. when it gets dark, the trees flutter an october song, meant to haunt the little trailers huddled on the beach. the one at the end of the dirt road has wood panels and me inside. when i peer out and see the marlboro's ember, i follow. there's an oak on the property, just one, and they (your friends, all in a row, lit cigarettes and quiet voices, whites of their eyes glowing) ask me to climb (they smirk when i do, watch my bare spindle legs scrape bark and dirt). i become an owl at the top, big owl-eyes looking down at my prey, ready to swoop. the trees' voices close in, darker, more requiem. the men call me down, spent cigarettes tossed, game over. but i stay, stop and listen. i see the moonlit sand, the sparkle-water caught in starlight. i leave tomorrow, but i wish i could stay here, where you can always find me.

Michael Meyerhofer

Two Baths

I remember one of our last nights when we shared a tub of cooling water in a motel beside the ocean and I read to you from Jarrell's story about mermaids while you wept and covered yourself with a towel.
But I also remember that we tried again a couple nights later and this time, you leaned against me bare-breasted in the candle glow, the ruddy dawn still distant as the flight that took you home.

Michael Meyerhofer

Passing Along the News

But for a few minutes as they fussed between her breasts that Tuesday morning a few days before my birthday, it looked like my mother would be fine.

Though her skin felt like a football, the paramedics had found her heartbeat, passed this news on to my father who found me pacing in the hallway.

Then they waved him back, told him no, it was just her pacemaker.

And that was something else he had to come back and tell me.

Charlotte Covey

phone sex lullabies

they're all different.
a certain style, a preferred moan. one asked me to be a little girl. i giggled and obliged, but imagined him imagining curls and bows, hairless flesh. another made words turn to violence. i feared meeting him in the street, knew i wouldn't have made it to my car. and yet, fingers flicking, i still pretended to bleed, breath hitched, helped him imagine neck blued and eyes popped. with him, i always screamed. but more often than not, it'd be little whispers, and sucking sounds, and them, gasping, god, baby, you're fucking mine.

Jesse DeLong

As if the runnel is a river

As if the runnel is a river, and the wedding dress a baby sent on a reed-woven carriage, the dress drapes over the storm grate. Bird lifts its fabric, the yellowish lace flapping as water gurgles into the opening. She leers up at me. This is where she will nest: the sun half-clotted by clouds.

The way you feel—a tooth sensitive to saliva.
“Yes,” Bird says, “I do”. Everything else is a squat little plot of land the wind begins to rip up.
Feeling the way you are, Bird, is sensitive. Saliva germs have begun to gum up. Fingers, stinging because the blood is too constricted, seem sensitive. They are really dulled by the way you feel everything. Or else. “I say,” she does. “Yes.”

Sean Lause

The old man in the cage

It is Sunday. The old man in the cage is wheeled through town again.
His lips tremble with violations.
There must have been a time when he was young.
He signatues the wind with words they cannot decipher. He is no one.
Though some say he knows when time will end.
His face is a map of sins and visions.
The citizens baptize their cars, their souls as white as the illusion of innocence.
They toss him mirrors and laughter.
He shows them rage and the seat of his pants.
He is the sum of all their ages, guilty of a crime he can't remember.
At sunset they return him to his cave, where he'll remain until they need him again to preen their jaded dream of being gods.

Sean Lause

The man who turned inside-out

In a sudden wind his mind turned inside-out like an umbrella.
He could feel the spokes of the real bend, groan, and break like the spine of that umbrella.
He could feel his own heart, his veins, his blood, his breath as if they were at last his own.
Words beheld the things they imagined, poems dropped gently with the leaves, and books read deep into their readers.
Then another wind turned the world inside-out, and he blossomed into darkness and light.
He heard stars whisper like children, the night bless lovers with planets conjoined, and dandelions chant silver to the moon.
Now he lets the storms blow through him, the sun enlighten, and the moon, in joy, dream him to the silence of his bones.
And the beasts that guide us home from memory lead him down their secret paths he never-always knew might still be there.

Jesse DeLong

Sitting on a hill overlooking Tuscaloosa

Sitting on a hill overlooking Tuscaloosa, the view we hoped for—what, exactly?—turns out to be streetlights in a dirty string over the valley. As if someone, too lazy, like me, to take down the Christmas lights, stumbled outside, post-storm, a June morning, and saw the lights strewn on the grass, still lit, though most of the bulbs busted, and didn't bother, because of how their light is subject to the sun's light, picking them up.

Smashed bits of glass, the trials of an afternoon—now only night, heat, the press of knucklebone.
The light of the sky, as if to make room, overwhelms with its bright bits of glass. An event that, after it happens, is stripped away. Memory is the shadow of someone in an alley as we walk by.
After you, trembling—the smashed bits of your life.
Only now, the night pressed. So often, a knucklebone.

Darren C. Demaree

Emily as a Charcoal Halo

I am secondary to whatever play Emily is in right now.
There's all this color that was never there before.

It's glorious.
We keep getting new tattoos.

I love the permanent art.
I don't know when she started drawing across her forehead like she is, but I have no trouble calling her a Queen if she wants me to.

She called me a poet for years. Now, it all makes sense.
Now, we are in flux with each other.

I don't know what will happen tomorrow.
I'm not asking, either.

Darren C. Demaree

Emily as Most of the Thunder Is Just Theatre

I was the park hiding from the moon widening

all over the world & I heard Emily fake a thunder storm

just to get my attention.
She knows I like the storms.

I didn't know
she would be naked.
Adults are too weird

for the park,
but in the darkness we can get away with almost anything.

That's how I got away with Emily.